STUDY NOTES · BASIC CONCEPT

Does the Indian Police Always Respect Human Rights?

Defence & Security

25 Dec 2022

Introduction

- The Indian police play an important role in maintaining law and order and keeping the country safe. But an important question is—do they always respect human rights?
- Human rights mean the right to life, dignity, freedom, and justice for every person. These rights are guaranteed by the Indian Constitution. However, many times police actions are questioned for violating these rights.

BECOME IAS
AI-Powered UPSC Preparation by ZINKPOT

History of Indian Police and Human Rights

- The Indian police system was created during British rule. At that time, its main purpose was to control people, not protect their rights. After independence, many old practices continued.
- During the Emergency period (1975–77) and the Punjab crisis of the 1980s, police faced serious allegations of human rights violations. Even today, the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) receives thousands of complaints every year.
- For example, in 2022, nearly 2,000 custodial deaths were reported in India, many of them unnatural. Police reform discussions started seriously after 2006, but full implementation is still missing.

Current Problems: Examples of Human Rights Violations

1. Custodial Deaths and Torture

- People sometimes die or are tortured while in police custody. Reports suggest discrimination based on caste, religion, or gender.
- In one shocking case from Haryana, a police officer tortured an accused person, and legal action was later taken.

2. Excessive Use of Force

- During protests, police sometimes use unnecessary force. There are allegations of fake encounters, torture, and misuse of power.

3. Misuse of Power and Discrimination

- Police are accused of harassing journalists, activists, and critics under political pressure. Minority communities have also raised concerns about unfair treatment.

4. Lack of Accountability

- Many violations are not properly investigated, which reduces trust in the system.
- Human rights organisations like Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International regularly highlight these problems.

Positive Efforts and Police Reforms

1. Training and Awareness: Police are being trained on human rights, use of force, and lawful investigation methods.
2. Technology and Monitoring: Use of body cameras, CCTV in police stations, and stricter inquiry systems is increasing.
3. Legal Action Against Wrongdoing: In some cases, police officers have been punished for violations, which sends a strong message.
4. Supreme Court Directions: In the Prakash Singh case, the Supreme Court ordered police reforms to make the police more independent and accountable. Some states have started implementing these reforms.
5. Community Policing: In many cities, police now focus on helping people during festivals, disasters, and public events instead of using force.

BECOME IAS
AI-Powered UPSC Preparation by ZINKPOT

Experts' and Public Opinion

1. Human rights groups say violations are still common and reforms are slow.
2. Police surveys show that police violence has become normal in some areas, while accountability remains weak.
3. Public opinion is divided—some people criticize police for abuse of power, while others appreciate their role in maintaining order in difficult situations.
4. International reports have also pointed out serious concerns regarding custodial violence in India.

Conclusion

- No, the Indian police do not always respect human rights. Problems like custodial torture, deaths, misuse of power, and discrimination still exist. However, reforms are slowly happening through better training, technology, court orders, and punishment of guilty officers.

- To improve the situation, the police must become more accountable, better trained, and free from political pressure. Citizens must also stay aware, report violations, and demand justice.
- Human rights belong to everyone. Protecting them is not only the duty of the police, but of society as a whole.

BECOME IAS
AI-Powered UPSC Preparation by ZINKPOT